reasoning in one place.*

— FROM THE FOUNDER

Why Curia exists.

Dr. Moore built Curia after years of observing a pattern that recurs across professional services: the institutional knowledge that should compound through long client relationships does not, in practice, compound very well. Documents go into the firm's archives. The client receives a year-end PDF copy. The next matter, arriving months or years later, begins partially from scratch — with neither side easily able to find what was decided when, on what basis, against which structures.

For retainer clients in particular, this struck him as the wrong design. A retainer relationship is by nature continuous — the work flows across years, the context accumulates, and the value of the relationship sits substantially in what both sides have built together over time. A billing portal — the conventional offering — does not address this. Retainer clients deserve a working interface that holds their structures, their decisions, their documents, and the firm's institutional view in one accessible place, available when they need it, not just when an invoice is raised.

The wider question — how a serious law practice should integrate AI tooling — pointed in the same direction. Public AI services are powerful but inappropriate for confidential client work. The right answer was a private, firm-controlled environment where AI tooling could support real practice work without exposing client information to third-party systems. Curia is, at base, that environment.

"A retainer relationship is supposed to compound. The interface that supports it should compound with it."
